MARKET OVERVIEW

Putting EM in context

From a portfolio perspective, there has been little incentive to venture out of developed markets in recent years. Across equities and fixed income, the developed markets have enjoyed outsized returns for the past five years, supported by ever lower interest rates and central banks' quantitative easing policies. Emerging-market assets, meanwhile, have lagged as growth rates — and commodity prices — fell dramatically, and, more recently, the Federal Reserve moved toward normalizing interest rates in the U.S.

Now, however, valuations in the developed markets fully reflect the benefits of a lower discount factor. The tailwinds of accommodative central bank policies are fading and may even be disappearing: We have reached the watershed of negative interest rates in many countries and wonder if they are helpful at all, as they are accompanied by tighter financial conditions.

Just as these tailwinds abate, the outlook for emerging markets is improving. Of course, some risks remain. While the C's (China, central banks and commodities) are calmer, we will have to watch for potential storms, including faster -than-expected depreciation in the Yuan or another sudden fall in oil prices.

What would happen if China crashes?

Earlier in the year, we were cautious toward emerging markets but kept an open mind. Now we think the time has come to actively engage.
